Category:Windows-only softwareAs computer technology has advanced, the size of memory cells and the number of bits of data that can be stored in a memory cell have increased, along with the speed of memory access. In one memory cell architecture, a wordline connects to a plurality of memory cells in a memory array, and each memory cell connects to a bitline and one end of the wordline. The other end of the wordline is connected to a row decoder that activates the wordline. A column decoder is used to select a wordline for a particular bit line. To access a memory cell for data storage, a wordline is activated and a bitline is sensed for data storage. The data on the bitline is then inverted and stored in another cell, or is output to another part of the computer. In order to access a memory cell for data storage, a cell has to be selected and the wordline has to be activated. The selected cell may be addressed via an address pointer and the row decoder is enabled to activate a wordline. As a semiconductor memory is programmed for a memory, a wordline can be activated to access a desired memory cell to store data in the memory cell.
